The purpose of this proposal is to elucidate some of the DNA repair mechanisms which are utilized by repair-deficient human cells. Studies will be carried out in both normal and UV-transformed fibroblast cell lines which are defective in the excision-repair gene, TK. Two different methods will be used to examine the role of excision repair: a) the efficiency with which normal and UV-transformed cells incorporate damaged DNA into their nascent chromatin and b) the efficiency of excision of UV-induced damage from DNA under conditions which block excision. The latter method will be accomplished by constructing a dna-incorporation system for studies on human chromosomal DNA. The relative role of a) nucleotide excision repair and b) non- excision repair in the UV resistance of fibroblast cells will be determined. We shall also determine the properties of DNA in the repair deficient cell line which enables it to participate in nucleotide excision repair and to be UV resistant.

Neuro-pathological correlates of clinical phenotypes in multiple system atrophy. Primary multiple system atrophy (MSA) is associated with a peculiar pattern of pathological change characterized by oligodendroglial inclusions containing alpha-synuclein and ubiquitin-immunoreactive neurons with preganglionic features. We studied the neuropathology in 27 patients with MSA and six patients with MSA plus in comparison to a control group. Three types of alpha-synuclein-immunoreactive inclusions were studied: type-I, neuronal; type-II, diffuse in the oligodendroglial cell, and type-III, axonally positive. Type-I and type-III inclusions were more frequent in the putamen than in the caudate nucleus. The relative proportions of type-I and type-III inclusions were similar in patients and controls, whereas type-II inclusions were significantly more frequent in MSA patients. In MSA, type-II inclusions were more frequent in patients with truncal autonomic dysfunction (ATD) than without (57.1% vs. 0%, p 0.05). The latter finding indicates a possible pathogenetic role for alpha-synuclein and/or a peculiar subclinical pattern of the disease, which may become overt. The densities of alpha-synuclein-immunoreactive inclusions were related to the presence of oligodendroglial inclusions, but not with other neuropathological features.

Tunneling in the disaggregation of amorphous cellulose fibrils. Disruption of hydrogen bonding in a cellulose I β fiber is a critical step in the production of glucose and other derived products from plant biomass. Here we show the formation of localized defects near the surface of the fiber after irradiation by scanning tunneling microscopy. The mode of energy dissipation, where the small defects act as nucleation sites for local melting of the hydrogen bonds, is indistinguishable from that of individual microcrystals. We argue that the initial step in the localized breakdown of the long-range hydrogen-bonded network is the formation of small defects. The defects can trigger chain scissions along the fiber surface, which are associated with the formation of small crystallites, as observed in
