Opening Ceremony Birth of Dragons Development Info Issues Content Upcoming ReleasesIt is proposed to carry out a comprehensive biochemical study of the endogenous protein kinases present in both the soluble and particulate fractions of mammalian tissues and cell lines. This study is expected to clarify the nature of the relationship between the three families of protein kinases, cyclic nucleotide-dependent kinase, tyrosine kinase and serine-specific kinases (including tyrosine kinase) and those enzymes which phosphorylate serine and threonine in a protein-dependent manner. Attention will be focused on the following problems: 1. Are these enzymes functionally and physically associated with the major sites of receptor-mediated signal transduction in specific tissues; 2. Are the enzymes involved in the phosphorylation and dephosphorylation of their substrates involved in regulating the turnover rates of these substrates; 3. Are there features of the regulation of these enzymes common to all tissues? The ultimate objectives are to (a) utilize the knowledge gained to develop a detailed biochemical analysis of the signal transduction machinery of the nervous system; (b) to clarify the extent to which this machinery is common to all regions of the brain; and (c) to elucidate the details of the molecular mechanisms which control its function. We would like to utilize both biochemical (determination of subcellular distribution of the endogenous enzymes and their covalent modification by various tritiated phosphorylating agents, such as [32P] alpha- and beta-aspartyl phosphate and [32P] cyclic AMP and [3H]cyclic GMP) and molecular biological (recombinant DNA technology) approaches to accomplish these goals. It is hoped that the research outlined here will help to elucidate the molecular mechanism of signal transduction in the nervous system and, in turn, shed light on the functioning of the corresponding machinery in other physiological processes as well.

I've installed the Chrome extension RootCSP to allow this control to be configured in the manifest.json file. I want to read a particular file as part of the extension and I thought that it would be a great idea to call fs.readFile() but because Chrome doesn't allow scripts to access port 80 or 443, I've installed an extension as a workaround which allows for port 80. In the manifest, when I assign a custom port for this extension's pages, it shows up when I run Chrome with --unsafe-port-pilot-url-loader. However, when I run the extension by its own using --remote-debugging-port=8390, it doesn't show up on my custom port and instead shows up on port 80/443. As my end goal here is to open the file with fs.readFile() so that I can read it and log it to console, I'd like to access port 80 if possible and it's not showing up after adding --unsafe-port-pilot-url-loader and running without --remote-debugging-port=8390. My manifest.json file: "content_security_policy": "script-src'self bff6bb2d33
