What's new in Toasterball:

of the Universe by Valorie L. Croft, Ph.D. © 2010 Galactic Connection One of the ongoing mysteries of the scientific community is the nature of the “myth” of different levels of consciousness. For example, we tend to assume that most of our thinking is unconscious, yet “consciousness” is a word of recent origin in our culture, derived from the Bible. Science became much more organized and systematic in the second half of the 19th Century and “mind” and “consciousness” was often taken as synonymous with the physical. It was also assumed, of course, that what we call “consciousness” would be the only type of experience that existed. In 1970, after a very interested 5-year reading-education program, Institute of Noetic Sciences (IONS) began its research into the nature and future of consciousness. From a community of mystics and poets, we began to look into what was “unconscious.” We discovered that we had ideas or metaphors for unconscious. Some were familiar: trauma, fear, guilt and sorrow. But then we began to learn about the more recent description of unconsciousness: the circuitry of the brain is hard-wired to experience and to behave in certain ways. True, we have not been able to measure the level of the individual’s conscious experience at any given time or assess awareness in detail, but as a number of recent studies have shown, most of our awareness is unconscious. The universe is not restricted to any one cultural level of consciousness. It is infinitely unique in its beauty and complexity. From the pure energy and matter of the quantum domain, our universe began. This is the level of the infinitesimal. It is only at the level of the atom and its subatomic components that complexity and life can emerge. Thus the quest for new insights and truth is inescapable. The concept of the universe as “beyond the edges of the Universe” is well-grounded in physics and in many of the teachings of Eastern thought from Pythagoras through Sankaracharya, Vishnu Purana and Bharatamuni. What that idea actually means will help answer many of the obstacles we face in making sense of current science and our place in this complex universe. Some misunderstandings are due to the way the general science world has been taught in the last hundred years. One of these is a belief
