The importance of nutrition in the prevention of hypertension: an overview. In numerous animal and human studies it has been shown that dietary changes can exert a profound influence on blood pressure. Some prospective studies also have indicated the possibility of a positive correlation between dietary changes and risk of developing hypertension. However, the observed effects on blood pressure have been variable and often inconsistent. Differences in results from diverse studies may be attributable to differing underlying characteristics of the populations studied and to variations in the kinds of dietary modifications made. Changes in dietary practices tend to produce small but statistically significant reductions in blood pressure at the population level, although the net effect in individual subjects may be negligible or even in the opposite direction. Open electric switch is usually closed by a switch operating mechanism. Sometimes, the operating mechanism has an oil chamber or mechanism to enclose two movable parts. Some oil chamber mechanisms, such as the one disclosed in the U.S. Pat. No. 6,598,120 B2, have been developed to enclose more than two movable parts. However, the oil chamber does not benefit from the effect of sealing and insulating airtight. The airtight feature of the oil chamber is very important for the oil chamber mechanism, especially when the switch is operated in a moist environment./* * Licensed to the Apache Software Foundation (ASF) under one or more * contributor license agreements. Photo Essay: Breaking the Chains of Drug Addiction July 13, 2013 On May 12, 2013 the United States House of Representatives took a small but important step forward for people living in drug crisis. Members of the House passed legislation calling on the Department of Health and Human Services to issue a rule that would allow residential treatment providers to provide unassisted recovery services to people struggling with addiction. While this may sound like common sense, the stigma surrounding addiction has limited the access that people in need have had to comprehensive and well-resourced services. For several years, residential treatment providers have attempted to take advantage of these loopholes in order to provide substance abuse services to their clients. This attempt has been difficult because of the lack of legal clarity as to what exactly constitutes assisted treatment. Over the last 10 years, House Republicans and Democratic leadership have opened a number of small cracks in the wall of stigma and discrimination that maintains people in drug crisis. They have allowed the Red Tape Reduction Act of 2012 to go a long way in opening the doors to affordable, comprehensive services for people with substance abuse issues. Every year, the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration (SAMHSA) receives hundreds of thousands of requests for Residential Treatment Waivers from providers of residential treatment programs. The agency receives these requests in order to allow certain clients to leave treatment and transition into recovery without the assistance of qualified and credentialed professionals. According to SAMHSA these requests are granted at a rate of about 75 percent. Despite the adoption of this loophole, a powerful lobby group known as The Harm Reduction Coalition (HRC), has lobbied the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) and the Department of Justice to maintain the status quo. The HRC, which includes the National Council for Behavioral Health and United States Conference of Mayors, claims to speak on behalf of the millions of Americans that are suffering from substance abuse. Since the HRC lobbies against unassisted or uncertified treatment, the group has perpetuated an unscientific myth that one cannot recover from addiction without assistance from a trained and licensed professional. As if this is a violation of human rights. To make matters more confusing, these arguments have developed into a moral question for people in addiction. Who is more deserving of help: those who are trapped in the cycle of addiction and are in need of comprehensive treatment, or those who are able to leave treatment and have harmed no one? The United States lags behind many other developed countries in its treatment
