What's new:

, Subduction Earthquakes Crater the Pacific Northwest The earth's subduction zone (plural) is a global process of sliding oceanic crust beneath the surface of the earth. It forms a distinctive ridge of faults and volcanoes above plateaus of volcanic rock. The subduction zone of the Pacific Northwest ranges from the Carlsbad fault near San Diego, California, to Mount Baker in the Cascade Range on the northern border of the Pacific Northwest. At longitude 115 degrees west of Greenwich, the leading edge of the Pacific Plate moves at a rate of nearly 1 centimeter per year over crust more than 800 miles thick. The Pacific plate is 8.4 million square kilometers (3.3 million square miles), making it roughly the size of Europe. Pacific Northwest Plateau and Fault Activity The San Andreas Fault in California snakes inland for nearly 1000 km. The San Andreas and related faults are the remnants of a young plate boundary across the deep bed of the Pacific Ocean, formed when the Pacific Plate, moving more than 100 times faster than the North American Plate, shoved the North American Plate over to the east. For a more complete account, see link of San Andreas Fault, Loess is a fine-grained soil that sometimes forms in wide swaths on the earth's surface, especially if glaciers have been active for a long time. Loess is a product of deep-soil erosion. The loess deposits occur where the rainwater leaches rich minerals out of soil grains and quickly moves into the bottom of bodies of water. Glacial valley activity creates natural dams that slow the flow of water, which allows the sediments to begin to accumulate. Other natural damming occurs when large bodies of water form when turbulent rivers hit a natural slope in the land or when the land huddles up along a mountain range to form a massive spillover zone. Some of this valley activity has occurred since the last glacier retreated around 10,000 years ago. The plate boundary along which the fault activity occurs is a zone of active accretion of the Pacific Ocean. The Pacific Plate is a large body that floats on top of the denser North American Plate. Because of the planet's rotation—counter-clockwise in the Northern Hemisphere—the Pacific Plate moves over the North American Plate, which is rotating in the opposite direction. The upper plate sinks below the crust at a rate of 19.8 centimeters (8 inches) per year. The sinking of
