When we have something like this: File file = new File("foo.txt"); if(file.exists()) { doSomething(); } else { doAnotherThing(); } when I create this object it should be a file which exists on my HD. Then when I close the program, the file get deleted from my HD. My question is: What I do not understand is how a String object, which I create and that I have stored on the heap of my computer, can recognize the place where my file exist on my HDD. A: It has nothing to do with file system. It looks like this public File(String path) and you have File file = new File("foo.txt"); Now, you probably didn't read closely what this does, so let me give you a hint. If you want to create file given a path, you have to have an absolute path. So, it can be with root directory (i.e. "C:/"), but if you give a path with a relative path, i.e. "/foo.txt", it will not

Carhartt Jockey Size pullover. Full story: Buy here: About the Carhartt Jockey Size Pullover: If you're an American flat track racer who fights to drive fast and flat-out, the Carhartt Jockey Size Pullover is your signature piece. Designed with the top names in flat track racing, this authentic muscle tee is lightweight and moisture-wicking, yet its durable, a drawstring placket and a pouch that fits a head phone or game. The Carhartt Jockey Size Pullover is finished with Carhartt's signature two-way front and rear duck-style embroidery. In a preferred implementation, the above described system includes a network that has multiple optional routes between certain points. For example, in a preferred implementation, the network has a single route between Manhattan and Boston, a single route between Manhattan and Philadelphia, and a single route between Miami and Miami International Airport. A line freeness analysis is performed on the network to identify the minimum network components required to provide a route for the aircraft for each of the destinations. The minimum network components are then determined for each destination based upon the line freeness analysis.Q: XSL - Adjacent sibling filter by attribute value of a node Suppose I have a set of XML:
