-up, although we have no clinical data to support this. The longer term outcome in the TGP group was analysed in the subgroup of patients who had a medical history of febrile convulsions, which is an established seizure predisposition in childhood [pone.0099495-Broman1]. We found that children who had previously experienced a febrile convulsion had a lower risk of continuing seizures at follow-up, but this was not significantly different between the two treatment groups. The present data support the findings from a previous prospective study of children with febrile seizures, in which they found no difference in clinical outcome between children in the GP and the TGP group [pone.0099495-DeVeber1]. As pointed out by the authors, these children may have continued having febrile seizures for a longer period, whereas in the present study any new seizures were medically treated. It is therefore possible that the increased risk of continuing seizures in children treated in the TGP group is not present in children with febrile seizures only and therefore does not represent a generalisable finding. The present study was clearly limited by the fact that we did not have sufficient statistical power to detect clinically relevant differences between the two treatment groups. One of the strengths of the present study is the long-term follow-up data as this was much more likely than a previous study to detect clinically relevant differences, whereas in the BAGA study the follow-up period was only 6 months. In conclusion, although the TGP group had a higher proportion of late recurrences in the first 6 months after the index convulsions compared to the GP group, this was not statistically significantly different. This highlights the need for prospective randomised trials to compare treatment regimens in the short and long term. We are very grateful to all the families who participated in this trial, as well as all the doctors, nurses, general practitioners and hospital consultants who assisted in the recruitment of patients. The BAGA study is registered on the U.S. National Institutes of Health clinical trials website (, NCT00020000) and ISRCTN registration number ISRCTN70249897.
