U.S. Pat. No. 5,609,821 discloses a process and an apparatus for the production of a paper bale, wherein a paper web is first produced on a paper-making machine and is then guided to a calender roll from which it is subsequently produced into a paper bale in an automatic bale-forming system. A first calender roll transports the paper web to a second calender roll, and between the calender rolls is a bale-forming chamber having a number of taker-off rollers. The paper web is folded at various places along its length and guided along the transport path to the bale-forming chamber, so that a substantially parallelogram-shaped paper bale is formed in the bale-forming chamber. This process and apparatus are characterized in that the transport path of the folded web is periodically interrupted so that the web leaves the calender roll and travels through the bale-forming chamber through which an infeed pulper with at least one rotatable infeed roll guides the web into the paper bale. The process and apparatus have the drawback, however, that the paper web is transported over the entire length of
