computer game is where the joy of playing video games is turned into a steady job with real impact on society. Just for kicks, I've written a game in the Ultimate Boggle-like interface for the MS-DOS/Windows platform. The game is called Charlie the Duck. I'll be adding voice, music, and some other bells and whistles. I would love to hear any suggestions for features, graphics, or story (It could be related to the old show of the same name!). The game has two modes: single player and hotseat multiplayer. You can either play with the files provided, or use your own files from a copy of Ultimate Boggle 3D. Charlie the Duck is easy to play. You have to tap letters on the screen to connect two (or more) letters in a line. Scoring is easy. Your goal is to make a line as long as possible with only one mistake. (One mistake is all it takes to fail. You can check your progress at any time). If you win a game, you gain one point. If you get all the letters, you get six points. Just click on the line in the BINGO board. Easy-peasy. To play with your own files: - Start the game. - Click the "Add word" button. - Browse for your own set of words, and choose the ones you want to use. - Click the "Start Game" button. The game has a control interface. You can browse through word lists, select a word, and play! There are also two graphics modes. One is the original (buggy) graphics, the other one is the one I'm working on. So you can play the game without lag or bad quality. (BTW, you can play with the control interface on the left or the right). Hope you enjoy this game! (And hope you like

What's new:

Unbundling The Unbundling of Time Warner Inc. Time Warner Inc. (NYSE:TWX) was a full bundle, for its first 150 years of existence. In that period, the company achieved impressive gains for its shareholders, and its rise from a single regional cable TV operator to an international media empire seemed unending. The company was the premiere manufacturer of ketchup by the late 19th century, employed more than 100,000 as World War II ended, and was once the largest entertainment conglomerate. But by the time it was near the cusp of the digital age, with subscribers all bolted safely to cable, it was not able to adapt to a new era rapidly enough to survive. Like many “big six” legacy conglomerates, Time Warner spent decades making sure shareholders had access to every penny generated by its diversified business lines. Older businesses-cable and satellite TV, Warner Bros. studios and consumer electronics brands, Time Warner Cable-grew into impressive entities. Because TWX was the massive brand with international reach, the cable and satellite TV business, when combined, was worth billions. Wall Street loved the results, more so as a share of Time Warner’s total asset base. Then came the television grabs: acquisitions and mergers that were technically legal but included sweetheart agreements favored by corporate lawyers for companies with deep pockets and dominating brands. Time Warner spent tens of billions to acquire Turner Broadcasting System (TBS), the sister company to CNN, in a massive $86 billion deal from the Murdochs in early 2006. Overnight, CNN became the face of business news, given first a pillar position on the big bank desks at Goldman Sachs, then a seat of its own in the NYSE Euronext, and eventually an independent news operation. Meanwhile, TWC's cable systems had secondary broadband fiber-optic capacity, which they funneled toward high-speed Internet service, anchoring it to their cable systems. In 2013, the explosion of the Internet changed the TV industry forever. People began searching for content online, via Google and through other avenues, and often turned to a phone for value-add services like data, calling and messaging. Cable providers could not adapt quickly enough, and today, independent and upstart distribution and live streaming firms can drive huge TV audiences to any site they desire, and even gain profitability on ads targeted at consumers who watch every moment of a live (and lucrative) sports or game
