The first translates as "more is more" and the second as "more and more". Perhaps an example from another form of addition would help. Say you are playing the flute (in the first is some technique that cannot be mastered by simply practising). You practise for a long time and are satisfied enough with your sound. But, as you continue your practise, each couple of days, you find your technique gets better. Now you find yourself practising for four hours a day and all of sudden your sound just becomes ten times better. That is more and more. Isn't it? A better way to say more is more is to call what is more over-rated or over-looked or not recognised for its genuine contribution. The term gained its footing in recent times to describe the current situation where over-rated and over-looked people often operate as a source of aggravation and little real difference. PPARs, also known as nuclear hormone receptors, are important regulators of energy homeostasis that play critical roles in inflammation, cancer, and macrophage foam cell formation. PPAR activation also inhibits lipopolysaccharide (LPS)-induced nuclear factor-?, TNF, and IL1 secretion in macrophages and attenuates atherosclerosis in mouse models. Given the importance of PPAR in inflammation, cancer and atherosclerosis, further understanding of the molecular mechanisms involved in

PPAR activation is important. Recent work in my laboratory indicates that PPAR isoform activation interferes with LPS-induced NFkB signaling through interference with the MEK/ERK pathway, resulting in altered promoter selectivity of key chemokine genes such as MCP-1 and IL-6. PPARs act as 'master inducers', namely they regulate expression of many genes in response
