Q: Passing a private attribute of a parent instance in a child instance I am working with objects which need to store a lot of data and contain a parent object. For example, let's say I have the following code: class Parent: # 100 lines of initialization code def __init__(self,...): for i in self.__names: self.__names[i] = SomeClass() class Child1(Parent): def __init__(self,...): for i in self.__names: self.__names[i].parent = self class Child2(Parent): def __init__(self,...): for i in self.__names: self.__names[i].parent = self I might have a dozen or so children inheriting from Parent and passing in their data on construction. For example, Child1.__init__ passes in a field called self.name (and other properties) and Child2.__init__ might pass in a field called self.color. I've noticed a problem when working with this in some other code. Let's say I have a bunch of instances of Child1; I would expect that any of these would have a reference to the instance of the parent, so that when I later reference a property of the parent (like self.name or self.color), I would be referring to the correct instance. However, I have found that the self.name references here are pointing to a field on the Child1 instance rather than the self.name I defined in the parent. Why is this happening, and how do I get the correct field? A: This is probably something to do with the __init__ method. As the documentation states: If a class defines a __setattr__() method, its __init__() method is called after the class is initialized. You may use the class's __init__() method
