nation's third leading killer for adults. There are over 700,000 strokes per year in the United States alone. Of that number, about 100,000 are hemoragic. Of the 700,000 strokes, less than two-thirds are acute ischemic strokes, caused by a clot or embolism. The most common cause of embolic stroke appears to be the movement of a clot from its place of formation in the heart, to the brain and then to the other side of the body. When a stroke victim has had a prior heart attack, the chance that another heart attack will develop is significantly raised. The best way to avoid another stroke is to prevent the original cause. The best way to prevent a stroke is by correcting the causes in the first place. Many patients are at risk for embolic stroke or suffering a stroke for reasons other than the causes described above. First, many patients have a transient ischemic attack (TIA), sometimes called a mini-stroke, rather than a true stroke. These patients are much more likely to have a future stroke than is a patient with a true stroke. Second, patients with symptomatic carotid stenosis, i.e., narrowing of the carotid arteries, are at risk. Third, atrial fibrillation patients can have a stroke. Atrial fibrillation is a very common condition, in which the patient's heart beats in an erratic manner. This is due to the fact that the patient's heart muscle is too weak to maintain a regular rhythm. The erratic rhythm decreases the time in which the valves are open and allows blood to be pumped out of the left atrium. In addition, this condition increases the incidence of clotting, both from the abnormal pumping of blood and the use of alcohol. Atrial fibrillation is a condition that is estimated to affect 6d1f23a050
