Recent functional magnetic resonance imaging (fMRI) studies have shown that this diurnal rhythm varies as a function of wakefulness, sleep, and stages of brain development. The overall goal of the proposed research is to identify which genes are responsible for producing this rhythm. This goal will be achieved through two specific aims. The first will determine if the rhythm can be disrupted in mice by transferring diurnally regulated genes from one strain of mice to another. The second aim will search for rhythmic genes in mouse brain samples using DNA microarrays. A common strategy to study circadian rhythms is to take samples over a 24-hr day. Our current knowledge of circadian rhythmicity in mouse development, however, is largely derived from samples obtained at 6-10 hr intervals from animals housed in constant light. Disruption of circadian rhythmicity in the developing central nervous system (CNS) may lead to behavioral deficits and may also predispose the organism to disease. The development of a circadian system which could be used as a model for the study of circadian behavior, therefore, may be of great interest. For this reason, we propose to transfer genes which confer diurnality to mice of a different genetic background. This could be achieved by inserting
