A: The issue is that I need to log into the domain (the domain uses windows auth to login) You do not need any authentication to access your router. Access your router page from the browser as: (ip adress) and you'll be on it. Note, this assumes you're using 192.168.1.1 as your router's ip address. If you are not using that IP, use your router's ip address. Is it possible to perform some sort of reset to an older state of the router? You can not perform a reset without powering off the router. I suggest your router has a button to do that. You could try to use the power off button, though it could be a bit tricky if you don't have experience with the router. Q: iOS universal project with UINavigationBar / UITableView I've been trying to use a navigation bar and a tableView in the UINavigationController but the tableview is not visible unless i select the tab in the navigation bar. In my first tab I have a button in the navigation bar that triggers the pushViewController to go to my second tab, there I have a tableView that is visible. I don't want this second tab to be shown in the navigation bar. Thanks A: I solved it using a UITabBarController that initially is the window's rootViewController. So here I make a tabBarController and put in the rootViewController a UINavigationController inside a UITabBarController and I add another UITabBarController on the tab named 'Other'. Now I have my navigation bar and I change for each tab the tabBarController's viewControllers. This way if you leave the window you go to the tabBar, if you select another tab then you go to the tabBar's viewControllers.
