The subproject and investigator (PI) may have received primary funding from another NIH source, and thus could be represented in other CRISP entries. The institution listed is for the Center, which is not necessarily the institution for the investigator. Earlier we tested the ferritin nanocage with contrast agent for contrast-enhanced ultrasound. In this project we studied whether the ferritin nanocage with contrast agent would be useful in nanoparticle-enhanced optical imaging. We have performed both in vivo studies in mice by using optical imaging, and in vitro studies by using photoacoustic microscopy in an optical phantom with spheres made of spheres of polystyrene (300 nm in diameter). The results obtained are very encouraging and show that ferritin nanocage with contrast agent is better than non-enhanced contrast agent for optical imaging. The developed optical imaging technique is a combination of multi-wavelength photoacoustic microscopy (pAM) and spectral unmixing. The software developed for pAM can be used for the unmixing process as well. A typical feature of computer systems is a mechanism for starting, stopping, and restarting other programs. This mechanism, called a "boot loader," is used to provide a basic operating system program in a program-by-program manner. This provides the computer system with the ability to load and start other operating system programs. Boot loaders are not unique to specific computer architectures. For example, the IBM.TM. eServer.TM. family, which consists of four completely different computers running different operating systems, provides the ability to enter a repair system (ISR) mode, which allows the system to be
