excellent introduction to the field and is the ideal. May 29, 2013. The National Academy of Sciences, in collaboration with the National Research Council, has released for comment a report on the future impact of climate change on societies around the world. As in the September issue of Aeon, I describe its findings as both terrifying and exciting. Science is helpless to stop climate change, but it can and should help societies find a safe pathway through a warming future. Climate change will become a bigger problem as greenhouse gas emissions accelerate, scientists say. Roughly how many people will die as a result? There are several competing predictions on this, all of them from scientific modeling. The likely midpoint of estimates is that as a result of climate change, by midcentury between 90 and 149 million people will be killed, depending on the scenario we consider, and between 20 and 40 million more will be injured. How will that affect a modern society, which is built around having full civil liberties and less control over people? The impact on individual liberties will vary a great deal in different countries and regions around the world. In places where wealthy people tend to live, in affluent nations like the United States, the UK and parts of Western Europe, people will have ways to adapt if they choose to do so. In regions of the world where people have little power over
