In this method a food product is inserted into an intermediate package with a packaging material, after which the packaging material is sealed together with the intermediate package to form a package. The invention further relates to an apparatus for this method. The intermediate package may be filled with food product under pressure, for example, and packaged in a predetermined position in the apparatus. Food products are produced in many ways, for example, as carton packs or as pre-filled packages, but are particularly suitably packaged as prepackaged foods. In addition to intermediate packaging, in which an intermediate package is filled with a food product and in which the food product is subsequently sealed, prepackaged foods of this type are also already provided with an outer package, which is provided with an opening and contains a flange, which must be folded around the opening of the intermediate package. In this known process the intermediate package is preweighed and then, after having been sealed, taken to a further processing stage. This final processing involves the folding of the flange around the opening, and then the removal of the intermediate package in order to make room for the folded flange in the opened packaging material. It is very time-consuming for the operator to fold the flange around the intermediate package, and additionally, since the intermediate package is designed to be separate from the package in which it is later to be installed, the intermediate package must still be weighed individually and held in place in some other
