Epigenetic programs such as histone methylation, as well as the transcription factor NF-kappaB, have been shown to be dysregulated in several animal models of these disorders. I hypothesize that in humans aberrant NF-kappaB activity in the central nervous system is involved in the pathogenesis of these disorders by altering neuronal connections in brain circuits that are relevant to the core symptoms of these diseases. Such aberrant NF-kappaB activity will be detected by the measurement of its nuclear activity, as well as its subcellular distribution within specific neuronal populations c6a93da74d
