The city of Barcelona is seeking architects to design two new, 145-foot-high, vertical gardens with a project called "Vertizoned." Although this is a new, the concept of vertical gardens is not. The idea is a massive vertical garden that would sit atop the campus of the Universitat de Barcelona. The gardens would be designed to support living things, not their needs. The problem with many vertically garden ideas in the past is that they don't do a great job of handling the often-baleful conditions they are subjected to. Since Barcelona's climate isn't too extreme, it might make a good place to practice with some novel designs. And the campus offers a large area for the garden to grow in. The main idea is to enclose a greenhouse in a cylinder and grow plants in it. From the gardeners' point of view, the enclosure would be a big and narrow door to the outside world. The materials that would be used for the construction are glass (to let in light) and steel. Lightweight stainless steel, in fact, would be used throughout the project. And the whole thing would be covered in a metallic fiber fence to minimize the weight of the structure, which means you have a nice and portion of view, the enclosure would be designed to be stable and in balance with its surroundings so it won't look out of place in the landscape. As explained in the New York Times: The lack of greenhouses in Barcelona is part of a general ban on building in the Eixample, an area that was developed with green spaces here.
