Is this a sign that developing countries are finally stepping up to the plate and addressing deforestation? Or is it just a diplomatic statement once again? Sadly, neither. Today's REDD+ final assessment does far more to punish developing countries for not taking action against deforestation than to commend them. It collects a slew of previous observations from forest fires, greenhouse gas emission inventories, and ongoing agricultural research in order to come to a conclusion about REDD+-related credits: "Loss and damage results from the main fire sources are estimated to reduce the REDD+ value by 38%. This means the value of reducing these losses in developing countries is 38% lower than when REDD+ is held constant." Unfortunately, this sort of alarmist rhetoric is nothing new. The 2012 assessment is no different than the 2011 one, which described REDD+ as "a complete failure as a climate c6a93da74d
