from the few meetings that we have had with the doj, it appears that they concede that microsoft is a monopoly in operating systems. in other words, microsoft has the power, absent the threat of sanction, to harm or kill operating system competitors. such an assessment should be made in light of the anticompetitive intent and the likely impact of the department's proposed remedies. for example, why would the commission rule that there is no need for more competition when the department's offer of proof is that it would be willing to license all the windows apis to an oem competitor at cost, and to let the competitor distribute windows to oems free of charge? 52. microsoft's leverage of its monopoly power in windows, windows server and windows small business server makes it possible for microsoft to exclude competitors from the development of middleware and its interfaces to client operating systems. microsoft cannot demand that oems install its applications on client computers, but it can grant a license to oems, such as panasonic, at cost, so that end users can run windows and other microsoft applications on client pcs. this approach can be extended to virtually all middleware, including operating systems, applications and client libraries for building interfaces to the windows operating system. we have every reason to believe that microsoft will demand the same arrangement in the case of .net. for these reasons, the division's use of microsoft's monopoly power in operating systems to compensate for the absence of competitive middleware and middleware interfaces is questionable. the commission, however, has an obligation to consider relevant evidence and arguments that are raised in comments on a consent decree. now that the department has raised the issue, the commission has a particular responsibility to accept the evidence, analyze it, and provide a reasoned explanation.
