to date, only 22 pieces of black box have been retrieved from china's airplane crashes, in which 181 chinese were killed and 108 people survived the crash, according to cai dengshan, former vice minister of civil aviation administration of china. while delivering goods, the plane crashed in the dark on monday, about 3.5 miles (6km) from ruyuan, the local government said. most of the 149 people aboard the aircraft were passengers, and the crew comprised four people. the plane, one of china's newest, crashed a few minutes after takeoff, state-run xinhua news agency reported. searchers believe the aircraft malfunctioned after taking off from the capital of the central province of hunan, changsha, for the city of nanning in the nearby southern province of guangxi. at least 20 bodies have so far been found near the crash site and others are believed to be buried in the muddy ground of a nearby river, the state-run china central television reported. the "black box" refers to the full-motion video recording device installed in the airplane to collect data on every operation of the plane. the flight recorder is found at the crash site under muddy and shallow water, the crash team said. black boxes, a requirement of the us federal aviation administration, are used to build detailed records of the aircraft's flight path in real time. the flight data recorder, also known as the cockpit voice recorder, is a small box that includes a microphone and speakers that capture sounds and data during a flight. the recorder will contain a recording of the captain's cockpit voice,

the first signs of trouble on air canada 797, a dc-9 flying at 33,000 feet en route from dallas to toronto on june 2, 1983, were the wisps of smoke wafting out of the rear lavatory. soon, thick black smoke started to fill the cabin, and the plane began an emergency descent. barely able to see the instrument panel because of the smoke, the pilot landed the plane in cincinnati. but shortly after the doors and emergency exits were opened, the cabin erupted in a flash fire before everyone could get out. of the 46 people aboard, 23 died. the search for those aboard the china eastern airlines boeing 737-800 jetliner and its second black box continued on friday, following its crash in south china's guangxi zhuang autonomous region on monday. more orange pieces were found at the core
