70 days and counting; headed into the tenth week of this journey. This week I had the chance to play with a state-of-the-art digital camera, and I have to say, I was blown away. There are a ton of camera options, and I had to pick out my favorites: Nikon D800, Leica M 240, and the Panasonic LX10. Ultimately, this was a difficult choice as the exposure and detail of the LCD on the Nikon and Leica were absolutely stunning.

The Panasonic LX10 had the most impressive display, and I'm really excited to try it. The D800 shots were amazing, it was very difficult to pick just one, and most of the comments I saw weren't about the camera, but rather the photography itself. Storage is a term that gets thrown around a lot in the tech world, and it has many definitions. I think it's safe to say that if you're an iPhone or Android user, you know what it is, and if you're not, you can follow along. Storage is just a fancy term for how much space your device has available for you to store your files. Apps, music, movies, photos, messages, and other information that you store on your device, files, and other files stored on your device. By default, iPhones apps and music tend to take up a lot of storage on your device, so it's important to limit your usage so you don't run out of storage space. I've even seen some cheap phones nowadays, which had the word storage on it which is a nice touch.

Bigger storage is always better, but remember that device manufacturers usually throw in some free space for the purpose of backing up your device. If you have room for free space on your phone or tablet, and you don't mind rooting your device and loading a custom ROM, you can get a bit more space on your device. After the evolution of the smartphone, image sensor, and mobile processors, the growth is driving up the demand for memory and storage space in mobile devices. The devices are more and more being able to perform more functions and with great high-resolution images and movies, the demand for storage is huge. Listing Agents: Usually deal with sellers and are the ones who will list a property for sale on the Multiple Listing Service. On the other hand selling agents (Buyers Agents) mostly deal with the homebuyers and list just a few homes for sale. They will sell the homes (which has been placed in the MLS) via the listing agents. Majority of agents will focus on one or the other. Some agents will spend their time between sellers and buyers and are usually regarded as the best ones since they are dealing with both parts. Real estate agents help people buy and sell homes. Agents educate their clients about current market conditions, guide them through each step of the process and make referrals to other professionals, such as home inspectors and real estate attorneys. Their particular titles depend on who they're representing in a real estate transaction. Disclaimer: School attendance zone boundaries are supplied by Pitney Bowes and are subject to change.
