It is however limited to the case where the supervisor has not successfully put their subordinates on notice of conduct that falls under the definition of criminal conduct [280] or the supervisor has not been properly advised of the associated risks involved in the criminal conduct. [281] Both supervisor and subordinates will have a "fair opportunity to observe and to seek to correct." [282] It is not necessary to prove that the principal knew that the agent was violating the law. [288] The actual knowledge requirement is satisfied if the agent was lawfully acting in furtherance of the business of the principal. [289] Thus, in situations such as a florist who takes employment from the clientele of a mental health facility, a doctor who operates on patients who do not pay their bills and an arsonist who hires people to set fires for him, the knowledge of the unlawful conduct is imputed to the principal. [290] What McKay did succeed at, though, is revealing humanity as fundamentally selfish. The distrust of the news network Fox News is easily laid bare, and all that stands between a good movie and its director is the most prosaic of elements: a timely twist. And, yes, finding a way to have its cast respond to this classic Inception scene, like a screen-cap of the day the comet discovery hits, is a small bit of genius. There is also a notion of high-wattage stars interviewing each other that either makes McKay laugh, or make him painfully uncomfortable. And, yes, the movie does hit upon the idea that the wealthy must realize they might lose everything soon, and begin to act responsibly. But as McKay once explained to us, that is only a change of venue. The crux is that humanity is fundamentally self-absorbed. We are willing to ignore the new comet, even if it might end the world, because we refuse to see our own predicament.
