The Hammond B-3 was a popular electric organ for the boogie-woogie era of the 1930s, 1940s, and early 1950s. Many artists, such as Bing Crosby and John D. "Donald" Hammond, made recordings featuring the instrument. Eventually the Hammond B3 made it onto the commercial market in the 1950s. The first electronic organ was designed by Emile Berliner but it was the designs of Leslie that really made the organ viable for use in the home. After the introduction of this new product, the Hammond Organ became as popular in the home as the stereo and then the hi-fi. In 1953 Richard Wright who was recording demo songs with a Gaylord Crescendo electric organ and Leslie 100 speakers, came to the studio with a transistorized Gaylord Crescendo and a transistor Leslie 15. It could be heard on the records of Frank Sinatra and his Orchestra The following year the Hammond Organ was used on many recordings by such artists as Nat King Cole, Brenda Lee, Peggy Lee, The Drifters, Donald O'Connor, Dean Martin, and The Ink Spots. The Roland D50 is a digital organ synthesizer released in 1992. It is the successor to the Roland D30, and was slightly smaller than its predecessor. The instrument is a culmination of Roland's efforts to digitally recreate the distinctive sound and character of the classic analog synths including the Mellotron, Clavinet, and Hammond organ. The Roland D50 has a massive sound engine of approximately 54,000+ samples. The keyboard has 88 accurate Roland-inspired white, bright sound buttons, and a free moving Leslie speaker cabinet. Yamaha has since released a knock-off of the D50, the Yamaha D5000. 5ec8ef588b
