in addition to sex-biased dispersal, juveniles of many raptor species tend to migrate farther than adults (newton 1979). among peregrine falcons banded as nestlings in the northeastern united states, barclay (1995) found that first-year birds were encountered at greater distances from their natal site than were adults. our results followed this pattern, showing that most long-distance movements involved first-year birds. in part, this may help explain why young peregrines in our study had a higher mortality rate than all other age classes. seven birds (four males, three females), six of which were first-year birds and one a second-year bird, were encountered at much greater distances compared to the rest of our banded population. five of these long-distance encounters involved birds recovered dead during winter, including a second-year male that struck a chain-link fence while chasing prey in san jacinto, nicaragua (3710km from its natal site in vermont), and a first-year male shot in camaguey, cuba (2696km from its natal site in maine). the other two long-distance encounters involved first-year males captured and released by banders in south florida, one during autumn migration and the other in early january. in addition to sex-biased dispersal, juveniles of many raptor species tend to migrate farther than adults (newton 1979). among peregrine falcons banded as nestlings in the northeastern united states, barclay (1995) found that first-year birds were encountered at greater distances from their natal site than were adults. our results followed this pattern, showing that most long-distance movements involved first-year birds. in part, this may help explain why young peregrines in our study had a higher mortality rate than all other age classes. seven birds (four males, three females), six of which were first-year birds and one a second-year bird, were encountered at much greater distances compared to the rest of our banded population.
