in this context, with the carpenter case effectively reopening the door, some states have moved to restrict law enforcement use of alprs. for instance, new york's state legislature in 2016 barred police departments in the state from adopting any form of alpr program unless the state's attorney general approves a plan for storing and disseminating the data collected. the statute specifically requires that "temporary retention or use of the image of the license plate shall only be for the purpose of determining the registration status of the vehicle, including whether a vehicle is stolen or a vehicle involved in an accident, and shall be deleted in no more than one year." footnote11_cfh1wc9 11 new york vehicle and traffic law §§ 250-h(2) and 250-h.1. as the law stands, however, this does not limit how alpr data can be used, only how long police can keep it. notably, new york's statute applies only to the use of any device that "captures or receives images, sounds or data of any type from any street vehicle in the state for the purpose of determining, or assisting in determining, any agency, department or entity of the government of the state or of any political subdivision thereof." footnote12_5n2if4f 11 section 250-h(2). these include images captured in license plate reader devices, as well as towed or handheld devices that capture images. so, while city and state police will still be able to use the data to run lists of stolen and unregistered vehicles in the state, the data collected will be bound by the same rules as the vast majority of the street-based cameras every day.
