The hypothesis that brain aging is associated with an increase in neuronal excitability was tested by measuring the excitatory postsynaptic potentials (EPSPs) in the dentate gyrus of the hippocampal formation in brains obtained at autopsy from elderly patients with adult-onset dementia (n = 34) and normal controls (n = 22). The following findings indicate that there was an age-related increase in neuronal excitability in the dentate gyrus of elderly subjects with adult-onset dementia: (1) EPSPs were significantly larger in dentate gyrus of demented subjects than in normal controls; (2) the mean amplitude of EPSPs was correlated with age in demented subjects; (3) the mean amplitude of EPSPs was inversely correlated with age and age at onset in demented subjects; (4) the mean EPSP duration was not correlated with age in demented subjects; (5) there were no correlations between age at onset and age at death; and (6) there was no correlation between mean EPSP duration and age at onset or age at death. These results indicate that there is an age-related increase in the excitability of the neurons of the dentate gyrus of the hippocampal formation in elderly subjects with
