These studies have laid important foundations for the growing and ongoing research in this emerging field. "Habit loop" theory models the dynamics of human behaviors in terms of three key steps: conditioning, memory consolidation, and reinforcement. Behaviors are conditioned by environmental cues, enhanced during consolidation, and sustained by positive emotional and mental states. The general conceptual framework provided by "Habit loop" theory is a unified framework that is theoretically supported and empirically supported. Over the past two decades, many published and unpublished studies have provided evidence for this theoretical approach. However, "habit loop" theory is almost universally applied to positive (e.g., drug) behaviors, and has rarely been applied to negative (e.g., anxiety) behaviors. The recent study by Nawa et al. ([@B1]) provides an interesting case that is informative for the generalization of "habit loop" theory to negative behaviors. Further, this study has the potential to inspire other studies in the general area of how negative stimuli can help to reduce anxiety. Although the current data of the study by Nawa et al. ([@B1]) has not yet been fully published, the preliminary findings are promising. These data indicate that anxiety can be alleviated by exposure to negative or unpleasant stimuli. Another interesting result is that the behavioral effect of negative stimuli seems to be more stable than that of positive stimuli. These characteristics of negative stimuli may provide useful new information to design a more efficient approach to anxiety reduction. One notable conceptual difference between positive and negative stimuli is that positive stimuli usually produce a brief momentary increase in mood or positive affect, and then return to a neutral baseline. By contrast, negative stimuli (or negative consequences) usually produce an immediate increase in mood or negative affect, which then increases even further. Importantly, a sustained increase in negative mood can lead to a positive valence shift (or, in other words, turn negative mood into positive mood). In this sense, the emotions elicited by negative stimuli seem to be qualitatively different from those elicited by positive stimuli. During the initial stage of
