Although oral contraceptives are frequently used in clinical practice, not many studies have been conducted on their genotoxic or epigenetic effects. In this study, we evaluated the genotoxic and epigenetic effects of the oral contraceptive use in a sample of women from a rural area of Ribeirão Preto, São Paulo, Brazil. Blood samples were collected from 36 women, who used oral contraceptives from the beginning of their menstrual cycle until menstruation. Twenty-two volunteers were in the follicular phase of their menstrual cycle and 14 in the luteal phase. Peripheral blood lymphocytes were stimulated with different concentrations of PMA (a strong T-cell activator) and ConA (a T-cell stimulator). Chromosome damage was assessed by chromosomal aberration analysis; methylation levels of vimentin and thymidylate synthase (TS) genes were evaluated by pyrosequencing. The oral contraceptive group presented a significant increase in the frequencies of chromosomal aberrations ($p < 0.05$) and a significant decrease in the methylation levels ($p < 0.05$) of the vimentin gene when compared to the control group. These results showed that oral contraceptives cause cell damage to DNA and an epigenetic effect on the TS gene. These adverse effects of oral contraceptives could also be related to the "environmental genotoxicity" that is linked to the toxicological effect of synthetic chemicals present in these drugs.
