Usage: FastSyncFiles [options] [source] [destination] Source: Specify where the original source is stored (Local or Network). If no destination is specified the source will be copied to the current working directory. Destination: Specify where to sync the source to. The destination can be specified with its full path or file name (the file will be created if it doesn't exist). Options: --help: displays command line help. --volume: only run if the volume of the destination is mounted. --force: force an immediate sync, overwriting any files on the destination. --dry-run: only display the list of files that will be copied without actually doing it. --progress: display the progress of the sync process. --noclean: do not remove all the intermediate files. A: To copy files from disk 1 to disk 2 use: cp -i /source /destination or mv -i /source /destination The -i means "interactive" meaning you're prompted for confirmation when an error is detected. You can use this if the source file has been modified, or if the destination is on another disk. The -i is also known as "uniquification", and is a feature available in cp, rsync, and a few other programs. To copy the destination files to the source You can copy the destination files to the source using either cp or mv: cp -i /destination /source You can combine both these together using the -R option: cp -Ri /destination /source It's a good idea to run the -i option with a non-conflicting filename so that it's easy to know which file is which. You may also want to run the -i (interactive) option with a force option, such as: cp -Ri -f /destination /source If the destination directory is on a different disk, you can use the -R (recursive) option. To copy all the files in a directory into a directory on the other disk, you can use: cp -R /directory /destination The -R option can also be combined with the -i option for convenience. To update the destination files with the contents of the source, use: cp -i /source /destination
