Bones of terrestrial birds are mainly acted upon by compressive loads in vivo, but also in some species are exposed to a dynamic environment. Therefore, the environmental temperature has to be taken into consideration when studying their biophysical properties. Since bones of terrestrial birds have been shown to possess a nonlinear elastic behavior in some studies, it is important to investigate the effect of temperature on this property. It was therefore the objective of this study to investigate how temperature affects the magnitude of bone stiffness in an avian species, the ostrich, by using force platform measurements. In the literature, there is no information about the response of ostrich bones to a static compressive force and, therefore, the purpose of this study was to establish the range of compressive forces that could be applied on ostrich tibiae. Seven male ostrich tibiae were tested by applying a compressive force on the proximal end in bending and torsion. Bone samples were preconditioned at three temperatures (i.e., 15°C, 25°C, and 35°C). Bending was performed by measuring the peak of the force-deflection curve, whereas torsion was measured at the ratio of curvature. The results showed that bone samples exhibited a nonlinear elastic behavior and that the mean flexural stiffness and torsional stiffness decreased with temperature. The flexibility of bone can be explained by the increased thermal conductivity at higher temperatures, which decreases the stress gradient and resulting in a decrease in load capacity of the bone.Q: Javascript Global Variable giving error Im
