That's not to say that Lightroom is better and that Photoshop is awful. Both apps can handle the same tasks with varying degrees of effectiveness. I am surprised that both are free after reading all the criticism on the Web. But what about the individual features? There's a large number of modules. Adobe have made an effort to stay up-to-date with many of the changes in RAW processing, and for some this does actually translate into a functional tool. But if you really want to use Photoshop you're going to have to learn many shortcuts and workarounds. And it's a big workflow that will get quite expensive in terms of dustry and time, particularly if you do a lot of digital scanning. On the other hand, Lightroom is a modular, developer-friendly tool. It is user-friendly, and it's free. Remember when Photoshop was first released? It was expensive. Remember when the Canon 5d was released? It was expensive. Remember when a 72MP sensor was announced? Then it was expensive. But if you look at what you can buy today, the price difference is small, even if those new cameras do feature higher storage capacities and sometimes better autofocus mechanisms. The trick is to keep pace. I think that's what both products are designed to do. And although I've dabbled in Adobe products before, I think I'm going to give Lightroom a fair try. And I'm curious to see what it will do with regular RAW files and the next generation X-Trans sensor. It's a fair call to ask Wacom to stop working for a bit. Their flagship pen and touch experience is clearly the best of the best. It's also somewhat unfortunate that Adobe has chosen to use their own tangent to the list of touch technology companies. But then we all know what that process is like. Until Wacom works up their technology and provides a proper tradeoff between technology and price, we'll have to roll with what's available. At least one of the top contenders is clearly the choice to make.
