The present invention relates to packaging and, more particularly, to an apparatus for attaching a film to the bottom or back of a can. Packaging is the single largest expenditure for the canning industry. Because the canning industry continually seeks to improve its products and to cut costs, can manufacturers constantly seek ways to minimize the overall packaging costs. One major area where this is occurring is in packaging the products without the use of traditional two piece cans. These new systems replace the old beverage can used for packaging various soft drinks and carbonated beverages. One of the advantages of these new systems is the elimination of the two piece can. As a result, the can manufacturers can reduce the cost and resources required to package and ship the products. However, an important obstacle to the use of new two piece systems is the cost of the film used to package the product in the can. In general, the containers are filled with a product in a sealed can that is then sealed. The can bottoms are then attached to the sides of the can. This attachment process is referred to as attaching the can bottoms or attaching the cans to each other. As the cans are transported to the final assembly line, the cans are normally held in racks. The racks are typically attached to a pallet or a conveyor system. The cans are removed from the racks and placed on an assembly line that attaches the can bottoms to the cans. As one can is being filled, the next can is normally already being filled. The filling and emptying of the cans is usually done using a robot. Consequently, the cans are transported using a robotic arm that lifts the individual can from the conveyor system and places it in the can attachment machine. The machines that attach the can bottoms and assemble the cans into larger containers are typically very expensive and require a fair amount of set up time before an automated system is operational. The process of filling, emptying, and attaching the can bottoms to the can is thus complex, and a key area where cost savings can be realized. The current method
