A new feature makes it possible to launch Photoshop on your iPad and load your cloud processing settings—a great advantage when you're shooting in remote locations. New tools include Focus Stacking, Deep Zoom, a Paper Copy tool, and a new exporting feature that lets you create a PDF out of any Adobe Illustrator document. The export function is only available for Illustrator users, but doesn't need to be installed for the process. Gaming on the iPad Air / Pro is a wonderful experience. The quality of the GPU is strong and one of the best specs of the tablet. Even with the tablet's smaller size, the 60 fps gaming is enough for most games. Lightroom is Apple's photo editing app and the industry standard for photo editing. Photoshop has always been the industry standard, but Lightroom has been the slicker, stabler, and easier to use version. The interface is still, despite some small ameliorations, quite awkward to use. It does not differ much whether it is a Lightroom or Photoshop operation on a given file. In fact, there is not much even that is different. There is still a slight adjustment of the camera Controls panel, as well as the addition of a few minor buttons. But Lightroom 5 still feels that it needs to provide more direct access to the file in order to work faster. I am talking about being able to see the image on the screen as soon as the user begins the operation. Instead of having to open the file and check the current order, crop rectangle, and so on, we just need to see the file automatically. With more direct access one would be able to work faster, more confidently, and more accurately. For example, instead of always having to think of the side-by-side image window as the destination of each operation, why not make it the default for every operation? In fact, the side-by-side exposure preview should be a default instead of an option. It should also be available for every adjustment in the adjustment GUI. The same goes also for the histogram and the levels. Even the brush could be user-customizable. And that brings me to the state-of-the-art Photoshop brush. Although I believe the brushes in Lightroom are quite well done, the range of shading and texture is quite limited. I would instead like to see a more flexible brush, the way that many amateur painters create awesome strokes using great range in colors and textures. For example, each 90 degree brush on the Wacom tablet on the left would create a radial gradient like that of a tulip.
