This paper presents a discussion on the general theoretical background of the analysis of the determinants of healthy nutrition in the family food culture and related events. The central concern of this analysis is the promotion of healthy nutrition through recognition of the family food culture and its structures in the family networks and the consolidation of healthy nutrition in everyday life. This study is based on a culture-structuralist model of identity, where the central theoretical dimension is the recognition of the self as a social being and the possibility of constructing one's own life-style. The analysis of family food culture in everyday life is developed with the purpose of improving the family's nutrition and its consequences for health. A case study is performed in the city of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, based on data from a survey with a sample of 196 families conducted in the urban sector of Nova Iguaçu, that is, with families living in the city centre. From the data, evidence of the family food culture is
