The biggest change of version 5 is that Photoshop no longer uses the World Wide Web as a way to deliver new features, but instead allows you to upload and download graphics you need directly to Photoshop. To make this work, you need an active Internet connection. You may be wondering, how is that different from the Cloud? Well, Photoshop will be available free of charge for personal use only. This means you can import and work with at least images and video clips. You can't save any files back to your computer. However, Lightroom has now included a cloud sync feature as well. The difference is, you can watch progress all through using the workflow. We will look at the new interface in more detail later in this article. You can also get to old versions of images and videos in the library using the Lightroom website. It also looks at your computer using different functions to make sure you aren't putting any malicious content in your computer. Basically, people are not allowed to upload documents with viruses or other malicious content. Does Lightroom really have to go as far as checking on your computer, though? Just look at what happened recently in the news, where a malware virus attempted to infect iPhone users . It could be argued that Lightroom should have added some security measures like this to prevent malicious content from being put on your computer. Still, I think that it's unnecessary. You are already voluntarily backing up your data and that's a good thing. And at least it shows that the software is aware of the threat of malware.
