This question relates to Spring 3.1 and spring security 3.2.3. I am using Spring 3.1 and spring security 3.2.3 and have already seen a number of questions relating to the topic but from a technical perspective, I am looking for an answer to the following: Does Spring security 3.2.3 support authentication of multiple sessions simultaneously? What I understand is that security forces users to authenticate themselves with the web site using their username and password. And this works fine on a single session basis. But my question is: Will the request itself consist of the username and password and other attributes (such as IP address) that might be required to authenticate the user? Or is it possible that the user uses another method to authenticate himself (eg enters a secret code, answers a question etc), such that several sessions are not necessarily (or not solely) initiated by the user, but from other sources which the user does not see? When users do not type in the password that is used by spring security to authorize access to a particular resource, but use other methods, will I have to expose the session id that spring security stores in a cookie
