Ceramic Tile Repair in Orange County Protect the right of all people to vote - to register. We also keep track of the dates of major challenges over the years. (I generally find the challenges give a pretty good view of where we need to push and how.) We have also reviewed the list to check that their objectives are already covered by the State. The perception that a higher proportion of inmates have mental health and. and disabilities, and to conduct baseline assessments to develop more. The Department of Correction also provides mental health services through a.Q: How to use the Oracle SYS_REFCURSOR I want to create a cursor that will be filled with data from a row in another cursor. The problem is that I don't understand how the cursor declaration works in the case of using the sys_refcursor. A: A SYS_REFCURSOR is just a reference to a system stored procedure called SYS_REFCURSOR. It's not a cursor. You can use a SYS_REFCURSOR like this: my_cursor := dbms_sql.open_cursor; begin -- code to do something with your cursor goes here end; dbms_sql.fetch_row(my_cursor); dbms_sql.close_cursor(my_cursor); You don't declare it (or open it). You just use it. To make it easier to use, you should define it at a top level declaration for the procedure. Like this: create or replace procedure proc_name (p_input in sys_refcursor) is begin null; end; See Also: Oracle Documentation Q: Why is this curve appearing in this plot? I've already seen the following answer (Curve in Plot), but it does not address my problem. I have a plot with a curve between points, but there is a curve under this curve which is really unsightly. What I want is that the curve is on top of the other curves in the plot. I have the following code: Plot[{x Log[x], x Log[2x]}, {x, 10^-6
