Adobe would benefit from getting as much feedback as possible about what people think about the new features. I, for one, need more time to test these changes. After using Photoshop for a couple of months, it's hard for me to stay objective. So far, my experience has been phenomenal. I no longer have trouble bringing large projects up in the Windows and Mac versions of Photoshop, and I'm also experimenting with the new features. Indeed, you need to see them to really understand their power. I can't stand not having information available, so this project has given me a chance to really test how powerful the new features can be. You can do it! I know you can! You can get a bunch of stuff done, and I'm impressed. I know I ran Photoshop perfectly fine on the Mac back in the day, but it's hard to compare it to the iPad version today. I didn't have any major issues with the Windows version, either. It's not about file size - it's about time. I don't mean perceived speed, or how fast it actually runs. I'm talking about the time it takes to save a large number of images. Let's just say that saving 30 images takes about the same amount of time as saving three. That information is important. When you're shooting a lot, the time needed to save and then process the images simply outstrips the amount of time it takes to actually take the picture. Working with Lightroom has to compete against time spent sitting in front of your computer. I can't tell you how many times I have had to sit and wait for Lightroom to go test all 27 processes it was doing at a time. Such delays are especially annoying when you've just finished a long session outdoors and then you've to come back in. A single image or two may take a few seconds to save. But if you try to leave Lightroom and another hour passes, and you come back to find it's still "Saving the 30th image" and you're beginning to wonder if it's ever going to finish, well, that's when it's fun.
